

LEST WE FORGET...: BELSEN

Eichmann's capture revives the world's memories of Nazi atrocities.

The news that Adolf Eichmann, the former Gestapo chief, has been caught and is now awaiting trial in Israel has made people aware of the fact that not all of Hitler's murdering thugs have paid for their crimes.

Eichmann is said to have been in personal charge of the extermination of millions of Jews during the war; estimates of the number of his victims range up to the six million mark.

Though Eichmann has gone free for fifteen years, others of his ilk either died by their own hand or were hung by the Allies after Nuremburg - men like Kramer, the Beast of Belsen, loathsome camp commandant of the most infamous of all Nazi hell camps.

These pictures were taken after the liberation of Belsen; seldom has a cameraman had a more revolting spectacle to record, and seldom has a set of photographs been taken which so brings home to the viewer the awful depths to which man can descend.

Belsen is no more, but thousands will bear the marks of its existence to the end of their days. They are the lucky ones, for many more perished inside its fortified boundaries, in a manner which was unprecedented in its bestiality.
